The terms "counselor" and "psychotherapist" are often used interchangeably and have many similarities, but there are some important differences as well. In general, counseling is recommended for specific issues and situations, such as addiction or grief, and takes place over weeks to several months. Psychotherapy, in contrast, tends to explore past issues that may be contributing to present day problems, and often takes place continually or intermittently over a period of years.

Counselling vs. Psychotherapy: Similarities and Differences

Counselors sometimes work in general practices to treat patients with mental health problems in primary care. Although the term counselling implies the giving of advice and guidance, in the past much of the counselling available used a client-centred nondirective approach.
